Certificate Course on Female Healthcare

COURSE CONTENTS

- ↓ Sexually transmitted infections and cervical screening
- ↓ Polycystic Ovarian Syndrome (PCOS)
- ↓ Menopause
- ↓ Menstrual irregularities

MODULES & TOPICS

Sexually Transmitted Infections

This unit contains sexually transmitted infections (STIs) and other sexual activity. It outlines common features and symptoms, routes of transmission, key risk factors for infection, and the prevalence of infection among various demographics and regions. The importance of early recognition, diagnosis, and treatment of STIs. Contact tracing, notification of proper authorities if applicable and opportunistic counseling of patients about options for the prevention of STIs are included.

Cervical Screening

This unit begins with explanation of the anatomy and functions of the cervix and identifies underlying causes and risk factors for cervical health issues including HPV (Human papillomavirus infection), cervical dysplasia, cervical dysplasia and cervical cancer. Investigation and offers information about cervical cancer and HPV, including updates about presenting symptoms, risk factors. Tests and emphasizes their role as one part of the diagnostic process.

Polycystic ovarian syndrome.

This module examines the prevalence, presenting symptoms, contributing factors and underlying problems associated with PCOS. Common features, risk factors and indications for further investigation to diagnose this condition are outlined. The module offers a framework for applying the diagnostic criteria for PCOS including presenting symptoms, specific criteria for diagnosis and the process for eliminating other potential causes and conditions to optimize the health of women undergoing treatment for PCOS. Tools and resources for screening and management of the condition are also included. The module concludes by outlining symptoms of complications to look for and provides instructions for detection and management of these symptoms.

Menopause

This module gives comprehensive information about the definitions, features and underlying causes of menopause and discusses the typical process and duration for each of the four stages: perimenopausal, menopausal, early postmenopausal and late postmenopausal. Methods for assessment and differential diagnosis of menopausal symptoms are outlined, including indications for further investigation. Four management options are addressed: lifestyle modifications, "natural" or complementary therapies, non-hormone pharmaceutical options and menopause hormone therapy (MHT). It covers existing research for complementary therapies and identifies potential benefits and limitations. Different types of MHT are reviewed including potential benefits and risks, safety considerations, and testing methods based on current evidence. It also acknowledges potential contraindications for MHT and statistics that suggest a lack of observable effectiveness in treating certain health conditions. In conclusion, the module outlines effective courses of action for adjusting treatment and managing complications.

Menstrual Irregularity

This module defines the common menstrual problems of abnormal menstrual bleeding, dysmenorrhea and premenstrual dysphoria and includes classification systems, diagnostic criteria, and clinical guidelines for management and treatment for each condition. It offers resources and guidance for clinicians in treating individual women who present with associated symptoms or meet the diagnostic criteria for these disorders. Each condition is broken down to subdivisions and outlines specific guidelines and aims of treatment for each case. The module provides information about screening tools, indications for additional investigation, and which examinations are recommended for diagnosis of each condition. Finally, the module discusses prevalence, common symptoms, and potential patient impacts, and details treatment options along with advice and supporting evidence for the effectiveness of each treatment approach.

Syllabus and Course Description

COURSE OUTCOME

Certificate Course in Female Healthcare is based on to understand and cure different types of problems. Women require health care more and access the health care system more than do men. While part of this is due to their reproductive and sexual health needs, they also have more chronic non-reproductive health issues such as cardiovascular disease, cancer, mental illness, diabetes and osteoporosis.

Certificate Course on Female Healthcare

COURSE CONTENTS

- ✦ Sexually transmitted infections and cervical screening
- ✦ Polycystic Ovarian Syndrome (PCOS)
- ✦ Menopause
- ✦ Menstrual irregularities

MODULES & TOPICS

Sexually Transmitted Infections

This unit contains sexually transmitted infections (STIs) and other sexual activity. It outlines common features and symptoms, routes of transmission, key risk factors for infection, and the prevalence of infection among various demographics and regions. The importance of early recognition, diagnosis, and treatment of STIs. Contact tracing, notification of proper authorities if applicable and opportunistic counseling of patients about options for the prevention of STIs are included.

Cervical Screening.

This unit begins with explanation of the anatomy and functions of the cervix and identifies underlying causes and risk factors for cervical health issues including HPV (Human papillomavirus infection), cervical dysplasia, cervical dysplasia and cervical cancer. Investigation and offers information about cervical cancer and HPV, including updates about presenting symptoms, risk factors. Tests and emphasizes their role as one part of the diagnostic process.

Polycystic ovarian syndrome.

This module examines the prevalence, presenting symptoms, contributing factors and underlying problems associated with PCOS. Common features, risk factors and indications for further investigation to diagnose this condition are outlined. The module offers a framework for applying the diagnostic criteria for PCOS including presenting symptoms, specific criteria for diagnosis and the process for eliminating other potential causes and conditions to optimize the health of women undergoing treatment for PCOS. Tools and resources for screening and management of the condition are also included. The module concludes by outlining symptoms of complications to look for and provides instructions for detection and management of these symptoms.

Menopause

This module gives comprehensive information about the definitions, features and underlying causes of menopause and discusses the typical process and duration for each of the four stages: perimenopausal, menopausal, early postmenopausal and late postmenopausal. Methods for assessment and differential diagnosis of menopausal symptoms are outlined, including indications for further investigation. Four management options are addressed: lifestyle modifications, "natural" or complementary therapies, non-hormone pharmaceutical options and menopause hormone therapy (MHT). It covers existing research for complementary therapies and identifies potential benefits and limitations. Different types of MHT are reviewed including potential benefits and risks, safety considerations, and testing methods based on current evidence. It also acknowledges potential contraindications for MHT and statistics that suggest a lack of observable effectiveness in treating certain health conditions. In conclusion, the module outlines effective courses of action for adjusting treatment and managing complications.

Menstrual irregularity

This module defines the common menstrual problems of abnormal menstrual bleeding, dysmenorrhea and premenstrual dysphoria and includes classification systems, diagnostic criteria, and clinical guidelines for management and treatment for each condition. It offers resources and guidance for clinicians in treating individual women who present with associated symptoms or meet the diagnostic criteria for these disorders. Each condition is broken down to subdivisions and outlines specific guidelines and aims of treatment for each case. The module provides information about screening tools, indications for additional investigation, and which examinations are recommended for diagnosis of each condition. Finally, the module discusses prevalence, common symptoms, and potential patient impacts, and details treatment options along with advice and supporting evidence for the effectiveness of each treatment approach.

Syllabus and Course Description

COURSE OUTCOME

Certificate Course in Female Healthcare is based on to understand and cure different types of problems. Women require health care more and access the health care system more than do men. While part of this is due to their reproductive and sexual health needs, they also have more chronic non-reproductive health issues such as cardiovascular disease, cancer, mental illness, diabetes and osteoporosis.
